Part of curriculum carried out: Trevor Noah on race, economy and politics - listening comprehension practice, Is identity a static or dynamic concept? – speaking, reading comprehension practice. - How does school shape students' identity? – speaking, -The school of my dreams – group work and students' presentations.
	Assessment / Notes : (1-7)	6	Teacher's Comments: Coleen managed to prepare and present her part of the presentation with the help of her team mates. She is interested in the lessons and willing to participate in them. However, she needs some encouragement to present her views. She works and contributes to the activities undertaken during the lessons effectively even though it seems to be a bit difficult for her to work in a group. The language she speaks is mostly accurate. Minor errors in more complex grammatical structures do not interfere with communication. Throughout her mobility and participation in my lessons, Coleen has always displayed a respectful and friendly attitude towards me and the students. She has represented her country in the best possible way.

OVERALL ASSESSMENT of the student's stay

On a daily basis, Coleen is a very kind and helpful person, she always asks if she can help in any way and is willing to do anything together. Despite the language barrier, she is open and willing to talk to her peers both at school and outside of it.

Coleen established a good relationship with the correspondent's parents and other family, visiting her every week. Talking about leaving Poland, she is sad that she will have to leave and be separated from her correspondent's family and cousins.

She established a very good contact with the correspondent from the project, they talk a lot and have many common topics. They help each other with studying and doing homework.

She is a very diligent student. She does all her homework and her approach to schoolwork is exemplary. Fulfills all obligations towards the French and Polish schools. Despite the language barrier, he tries to actively participate in classes and get the most out of them.

She tolerates her stay in Poland well, despite the long separation from her home, to which she is very attached and which she misses very much.

The student's attitude has changed a lot. From an insecure girl, she became more open, talkative and more confident in contacts with her peers.

The student became involved in the life of the class and integrated with the students from the class she attended for a month. She took part in CAS charity projects. She took part in school activities, such as the Christmas sweater day, the Voice of Jaga competition, and the humanities day.

She also integrated with a group of Irish students at school as part of the Erasmus+ group mobility program. She went on a sightseeing tour of Toruń, where she learned about the history of this city. She participated in gingerbread baking workshops, which are a symbol and an important element of Toruń's culture. She also visited the capital of Poland - Warsaw, learning about its history, the most significant places and symbols for the history of Poland and Warsaw.

During her mobility, she developed her language skills by communicating with everyone in English. The month-long stay at a Polish school certainly contributed to the development of social competences that are necessary for proper functioning in the school community. She learned about the functioning of a Polish school and the life of a Polish family. She established good relationships with her peers. Contact with her was also a motivation for Polish youth to communicate in English or French, an opportunity to make new acquaintances and make new friends.

To sum up, I think that the student coped perfectly with the duties assigned to her by the French school, with the tasks she carried out while at the Polish school and socially in interpersonal contacts.
